A WORLD OLD STORY.

BY REBECCA HARDING DAVIS. Mr. Joseph Latimer was the owner and ditor of a daily journal in one of our large inland cities. When hisson Hugh married he took him into partnership and made him managing editor of the paper, which by that time had become a very valuable property. Gradually Mr. Latimer gave up his active interest in The Age to his son, who came, however, to the house every evening to consul-with him.

One day, when the future policy of the paper upon an important inter-State commercial question was to be decided, Hugh found his father waiting in the half for him. He beckoned him into the library. "We shall not be interrupted here." he said.

hall for him. He beckoned him into the library. "We shall not be interrupted here," he said.

But the sweet, decided voice of a woman sounded from the stairs: "Bring Hugh up to my room, my dear. It is too cold for me in the library."

The young man gave an impatient shrug. "I have very little time, and it will take so long to explain the matter to mother."

will take so long to explain the matter to mother."

"Yes, yes," said Mr. Latimer. "But don't be impatient with her. Hugh; she used to consult with me about every point in the paper when it started and July the started said in the interest is just as keen now."

"It was a little 0x10 weekly sheet then, full of stories and riddles," grumbled the young man as he followed his father up the stairs. But he smiled as he entre the cheery little room, with its warm, crimeon drapery and bright wood wire, known in the house as Mother's of Corner, and gave his mother a hearty flug and kiss. She was a slight, delicate, y dainty dressed woman, with her white hair curling a little on her forehead, a soft color on her cheeks and a certain gleam of command in her friendly brown eyes.

"The Latimer children were all around." wit was a little dxloweekly sheet then fifll of stories and riddles," grumbled the young man as he followed his father up the stairs. But he smiled as he entered the cheery little room, with is father up the stairs. But he smiled as he entered the cheery little room, with same reimson drapery and bright wood wire, known in the house as Mother's Corner, and gave his mother a hearty hug and kiss. She was a slight, delicate, dainty dressed woman, with her white hair curling a little on her forehead, a soft color on her cheeks and a certain gleam of command in her friendly brown eyes.

The Latimer children were all prond of their mother's boauty and charm; and they were besides as fond of her as they had been when they were children, she being, as Hugh often said, "the most motherly of mothers,"

"Is Clara with you, Hugh?" she asked.

"Yes; she is in the parlor with Frances. Are you not going down, mother?"

"Presently. I must take part in this your parler first." She sat down beside her little work table near the fre. "Gon, boys, I am all attention," noddig and smiling brightly at them.

The two men began their consultation, but under a restraint. Mrs. Latimer interrupted them with incessant weeting the statement of the same generation. After all, it is not was a start of the kind of person I wish Frances to marry. It is a case of Dr. Fell, I suppose. "Vour father, when he came to list me, was grave and tender and courteous. This young man is filippant; he is cotronally joking and making puns. The chitter-chatter that goes on between him and Frances wearies me beyond entire interrupted them with incessant was all hardly engage herself to such the kind of the reason have you?"

ion, but under a restraint. Mrs. Latimer interrupted them with incessant questions.

"I am shamefully ignorant on this matter, Hugh," she said at last. "Indeed, I have not helped you at all on the Age this winter, as I should have done. What with managing the house and taking Frances into society and overlooking Jerry at college, I have lost on hone and foreign politics."

"I keep Clara in ignorance of both," said Hugh. "A fond muddle everywhere, I tell her. Women had better keep apart from it."

"Oh, Clara!" The color rose to Mrs. Latimer's cheek. She was silent a moment. "Pray do not decide on this matter, Joseph," she said, "until I have looked into it a little. Your papa used to say, Hugh, 'Give me Susan's intuitions before any man's reasonings." She smiled fondly at her husband.

"Ah, mother, you like to put your little fingers into every pei!" said Hugh, with a short, annoyed laugh.

Mrs. Latimer shot a keen glance at him. The joke jarred on her. As she sat there every day, listening to the family consultations, she always liked to remember Madame de Maintenon stitching at her seam in the council of the king, speaking the decisive word which."

"Only of course," said Hugh, "Will you walk down street with me, father? The night is pleasant."

The angry tears rose to Mrs. Latimer's eyes. "My opinion is of very little value, I see," she said. "I shall not offer it again. Do as you think best."

Hugh put his hands on her shoulders and kissed her. "I am afraid we must in this case, mammy dear," he said, "Noble will be a big card for us. I must telephone for him to-night. The Eva is drying to snap him up."

She knitted her brows and snipped her threat wrathfully, but did not spreak. Hugh remembered how these signs used to make his heart quake when he was a little chap, standing before her knees. Dear mammy! Under all she was all ways soft-hearted and loving. He recollected that he had promised Jerry to try to change his mother's opinion in a certain matter, and with the blundering dullness of a man he chose this most unlacky moment to do it.

"Oh, by the way, mother; about Jerry." "Well, what about Jerry?" said Mrs. Latimer, coldly.

But Hugh just now had spoken to her as to a child who must be amused.

"Hugh!"

Only the other day she was teaching the dull boy his primer; and how dull he was?

They were talking now of a newspaper man from New York, who had written two or three articles for The Age.

"If you say so, father," said High, "I will make a permanentarrangement with Noblet to-night. He is the very man for the times."

"Then the times demand neither wit, logic nor sense." said Mrs. Latimer, with accrbity. "The man is slangy and shailow."

"By lowering its tone? His style is execrable. Surely you will allow, Joseph, that I am a judge of good English. You used to say that my taste was founded on the best models."

"Yes, yes, Susan; but the models and you and I are all a little old fashioned, I am afraid."
